

THIRD COAST FOUNDRY

Advancing Midwest Innovation

Third Coast Foundry is a new physical space in San Francisco for partner university-founded startups and teams traveling to the Bay Area.

Designed to improve access to venture capital and networks on the West Coast without requiring startups to relocate, it provides opportunities for investors, alumni, and other partners to engage through meetings, events, and programming.

At its core, Third Coast Foundry is a bridge between Midwest innovation and coastal capital.

How much longer it often takes Midwest founders to raise their first $500,000 compared to coastal peers, according to PitchBook analysis

This first funding is a critical part of a startup's long-term success.

The Midwest produces a significant share of the nation's talent, but founders based outside the coasts often face:

- Longer fundraising timelines
- Less frequent exposure to high-density venture capital
- Challenges in building coastal investor relationships

To help Midwestern founders compete for funding, they need access and visibility in the Bay Area. Through Third Coast Foundry, founders can establish a presence on the West Coast without relocating themselves or their companies.

Third Coast Foundry expands access and options for Midwestern startups.

Gives Midwest startups a home base in the Bay Area venture ecosystem

Makes it easier for investors to efficiently engage with multiple Midwest pipelines

Enables founders to pursue capital and partnerships without uprooting teams

Intentionally designed as a collaborative, multi-university model

Located at 625 Second Street in San Francisco's South Park neighborhood, Third Coast Foundry is steps from the Bay Area's AI corridor and leading venture firms. It represents one of the Midwest's first collaborative, multi-university locations in the Bay Area focused on venture engagement and innovation support.

Third Coast Foundry is located a few blocks from everyday amenities such as Oracle Park, the waterfront district near The Embarcadero, with cafés, restaurants, parks, and a multitude of transit options all within easy walking distance.
